Review: Access to audio visual, news, classroom drug education curriculum and other resources aimed at preventing the uptake or use of alcohol or other drugs. Site as a pro-abstinence stance. Provides a conservative, alternate way to teach drug education with many links to national and international sites.

Recommend checking the statistics and facts before using with parents or students as the abstinence bias does not always reflect other Australian evidence-based research, practice or policy guidelines.

Review: A private, commercial program established by a past international athlete who uses her own experience of dependence to present alcohol and other drug prevention programs in schools - "Just say no", advice to parents and a life-skills program for prisoners. ADIN does not provide quality assurance on the efficacy of the program itself and suggests viewers familiarise themselves with national drug education guidelines. Some content is factually incorrect and does not provide appropriate referencing.

Review: Annual campaign to promote the societal benefits of prevention, alcohol and other drug treatment, and recovery for mental health and drug use disorders. Celebrates people in recovery and lauds the contributions of service providers. It is possible to access materials from current and previous campaigns and to read the summaries of Q's and A's provided by experts on a variety of topics. This latter information can provide useful ideas for similar public health campaigns. There is a 'Toolkit' which can be downloaded in PDF with information for consumers, their families and veterans.

Review: Interdisciplinary centre with a commitment to research, training and guidance to cultivate healthy and safe communities. The centre applies science to develop evidence-based solutions, initially for local communities which are formally engaged in the research and health promotion processes, and then shared more widely through webinars, e-news, training, professional development and other academic resources. A site best suited to social health academics, social health professionals and persons involved in the development and implementation of social health policy. Use the search tool to identify work specifically related to increasing positive mental health and wellbeing or to reducing the harms from alcohol and other drugs.

Review: Government link to grant and tender opportunities, and publications in response to the findings of the National Ice Taskforce. While the taskforce was established to primarily address the community, health and budget challenges being experienced as a result of a rapid shift in the types of amphetamine being used and supplied, there is scope for health, academic and community organisations to develop research, treatment and early intervention initiatives to reduce the harms of a variety of illicit substances. The taskforce also acknowledges the health, social and financial costs of comorbidity issues within the framework and provides regular opportunities to apply for funding for initiatives which reduce overall harms to individuals and communities.

Review: Access via this site to Commonwealth Government resources and information relating to the dangers of sniffing inhalants. Included are links to older, albeit still useful, resources that address issues specifically for men and the evidence linking sniffing and domestic violence. Links are also provided for resources which are targeted to women, some of which identify risks for unborn children when using inhalants during pregnancy. For people providing health services to Indigenous populations, resources have been developed to be purposefully culturally sensitive to some that are strictly men's business and some strictly women's business. Images and language in flip chart resources may be stigmatising.

Review: This site contains archived material resulting from early national work around the use, supply and distribution of Ice and other psychostimulants. There was a particular focus in this funding round to develop education materials for, and distribution of harm reduction information to youth and front line AOD workers. Included in this site is a link to the National Amphetamine-Type Stimulant Strategy, 2008-2011. The materials are mostly relevant to researchers, academics and policy professionals requiring comparative data.
